No pictorial efibr could convey the solemn majesty of this scene. When the sun began to rise in deep red over the wall of mountains the scene was still more grand; the precipitous cliffs of the Geant, bearing up the fortresses of ice, cut the golden sky with their black edges, and while on one side scarcely any light appeared in the sky, the other was in hard relief against its brilliancy. The Dome de Goute, now opposite the sun, was a mass of gorgeous violet colour, which being reflected on the prominences of emerald green ice on the plain before us gave a variety and peculiarity that if correctly described would sound like a magic illusion--it seemed like walking on a huge prism. At half-past 5 they arrived at the Grand Plateau; and then by a precarious staircase, cut in the ice by the axes of the guides, ascended the terrible Mur de la Cote. This accomplished, the last and highest dome of the mountain appeared before them. This dome, indeed, looked like Mont Blanc in itself; but its symmetrical form, a perfect pyramid, I should think about as high as St. Paul s, was assurance that here was the Monarch s crown indeed. The dangerous inclination to sleep, so fatal at these elevations, now seized the whole party, and when they had made some further progress with great labour, most threw themselves down on the ice, declaring they would sleep...
